Outline:
Money. At its simplest, fraud is about money. You used to have it, and now someone else has taken it from you. That simple equation is at the heart of fraud affecting an individual or a major financial institution, or even a country. The hunt for that money (and trying to bring it back home) is at the heart of fraud investigation.

This presentation will use case studies to examine a selection of Hong Kong and international fraud cases to highlight common points of investigative focus, common principles and practices, the limitations that law and ethics place on the fraud investigator and the limits that borders put on finding and recovering the stolen cash. Fraud doesn't always start and end with a criminal offence; commercial organisations of all sizes have to consider other factors in tackling a dishonest loss. Those considerations affect how to approach an investigation and where that investigation leads. Spoiler alert: there are few happy endings in fraud investigation.

Outline:
The outbreak of COVID-19 last year resulted in a drastic surge in fraud globally. Hong Kong has seen many email, telephone and investment scams involving stock market manipulation. Hong Kong’s Securities and Futures Commission (SFC) has made this is their top enforcement priority in 2021. Against this backdrop, where funds held in bank and securities accounts are caught-up in investigations and are frozen due to anti-money laundering or fraud-related concerns, what is the role of forensic accountants and lawyers in investigating and assisting in the unfreezing process?

This session will cover:
- Legal and regulatory basis for freezing of funds and bank/securities accounts
- What legal remedies do you have if your funds or bank/securities accounts have been frozen
- The role of forensic accountants in investigating fraud and in remediating regulatory non-compliance
- How forensic accounting could assist lawyers and clients in the unfreezing process
